Course Description

What does it mean to be European at the beginning of the 21st century? Why have issues of nationality, ethnicity and race become so central to Europeans during the last few years? What is the historical and cultural background to developments such as the fracturing of former multi-national states, the worrying rise of populists and the far right in politics, the development of a supra-national European Union, and the public debate on asylum and immigration? This course examines recent debates about the nation-state, national identity, ethnicity, immigration and the idea of Europe from the end of the Cold War to the present day.
