Course Description

This course introduces key issues of pertinence in Maritime Security and geopolitics of the Sea. It demonstrates why the maritime domain is a space of great strategic interest, and how threats to security at sea have a real impact for states and people around the world. It explores a myriad of threats to security playing out at sea, while also looking at some of the mechanisms, tools, strategies, and key actors involved in addressing these challenges. Each part provides an overview of the issue it discusses and considers regional case studies as an illustration. The course utilizes a multidisciplinary perspective with interrelated considerations from very various fields of research (political science, international relations, social anthropology, political economy, international law, and history), as well as lessons learned from practitioners and policymakers, to develop a comprehensive and better informed understanding of debates and developments related to maritime security issues.
