Course Description

This second-semester course introduces students to the history of literature in Scotland in English and Scots, covering two periods of its self-conscious revival: the Modernist "Scottish Renaissance" between the world wars of the 20th century, and the contemporary period, defined as beginning with the first Devolution Referendum and the election of Margaret Thatcher as British prime minister in 1979. It focusses on how questions of literary form relate to the social, political, and intellectual context in which the text was written and read; that is, on how the text's formal achievement responds to changes in Scottish society and the wider world.
