Course Description

The course introduces students to important substantive areas and concepts in the governance and planning of cities and urban regions. It explores current issues and debates in selected sectoral planning systems, their institutions and planning instruments, their interests and ways of thinking. This includes environmental and nature conservation policies, infrastructure policies (e.g. water, wastewater, energy, waste, transportation, telecommunication), the provision of social services, or economic policies and marketing strategies. Students reflect on how a diversity of sectoral policies and planning systems shape urban development and how they relate to and interact with spatial planning.
