Course Description

This course covers current events in political sociology by showing the methods and ways of how contemporary research can permit the best understanding of social and political issues of advanced democracies. In this way, the course shows how to have a debate, whether it be on society or science; how the methodological approach allows one to have both a necessary distance from the subject and a space of validation or negation of research hypotheses; or how according to methodological and theoretical constructions there can emerge divided authors and interpretations of studied phenomenon.
