Course Description

This course explores the economic history of China from the Qing dynasty through the present era of reform and restructuring. It examines the impact that the economic plans and demands of elites and the state had on Chinese society and culture, and the influences these plans had on what happens in East Asia and the world. This course provides a contextual overview of the role that economic development and economic planning played in the making of modern China, and how the economic decisions and directions taken by state elites in their quest to build modern China had and continue to have significant consequences for society. Some key themes covered include: globalization, international vs local models, markets, modernization, development, state-planning, total war, socialism, Maoism, liberalization and reform, and socialism with Chinese characteristics. Textbooks: Klaus Muhlhahn, MAKING CHINA MODERN: FROM THE GREAT QING TO XI JINPING plus weekly readings uploaded by professor.
