Course Description
This course provides an introduction to essential contemporary issues in forestry in developing countries, and gives students a thorough understanding of the current and potential role of forests in improving rural livelihoods. This course illustrates that forestry is an integral part of society and should not be considered in insolation. Students learn about the relationships between people, forest use, and forest conservation in developing countries. Central themes of this course include: paradigms of tropical forestry development, livelihoods of the people who depend on forests and trees, valuation of forest products, how to measure forest cover, deforestation, national policies on forests, and sustainable management. Students apply principles, theories, and frameworks to case studies, and reflect on the nature of poverty and the role of forests in poverty alleviation.
