Course Description
This course examines the history and methods of socio-cultural anthropology, a discipline that developed for the purpose of cross-cultural research in Western and non-Western contexts. In the study of religion, anthropologists ask questions about the diversity of religious experience, symbols, and organization through a specific set of methodological tools: long-term stay among the people (communities) studied, qualitative research, and a written account called ethnography, committed to representing “the native's point of view.”
