Course Description

This course examines key concepts of well-being and livelihoods and provides a grounding in the principle issues of medical and applied anthropology, population, and health studies. Topics include health and nutrition, population and the demographic challenge, migration and refugees, well-being, disease and illness, and poverty and inequality. Students examine concepts of well-being and livelihoods, from social and biological perspectives, and at the local and global scale. Students study the principal biological and cultural influences upon well-being and livelihood, and locate these in their broader economic, social, and ecological context. The course demonstrates how the traditional anthropological focus on the local community and small-scale society can be applied to the wider national and international picture of well-being. The course also surveys methodologies used in the fields of applied and medical anthropology, demography, and population studies.
