Course Description

This course is dedicated to the practice of writing as literary experiment: a radical inquiry into the possibilities of mind and language and, by implication, an exploration into the nature of difference and interdependence. As such it regards creative writing as an extension of critical reading and seeing. Through a series of workshops this course invites students to move through a number of short literary exercises, some of which orbit existing models, while others are freshly imagined. These are culled from the study of the methods, processes, and techniques of a range of writers and artists that cut across time and discipline, and are as different from one another as Virginia Woolf, Basho, Frank O'Hara, Paul Cezanne, Gertrude Stein, Charles Olson, Hélène Cixous, Amiri Baraka, Patrick Keiller, Charlie Parker, Raymond Queneau, Michelangelo Antonioni, Jackson Pollock, and Allen Ginsberg.
