Course Description

This course studies the ways in which the legal system affects social inequalities, be it as a tool for alleviating them or as a factor that increases them. The course covers the legal specifics of public policies such as labor legislation, the European welfare state, the American Earned Income Tax Credit, individual and corporate taxation, consumer protection and housing. It also explores inequalities in access to justice and the use of public interest litigation as a tool for social change. Finally, the course explores the way that national and international legal systems deal with global inequality.
