Course Description

Central to this course is the idea that policy-making is a guided process, as is the case with its implementation. The course explains the various levels at which policy can be developed (international and national) and the importance of sectoral policies such as agriculture, natural resources, industry and the like. The course examines the relationship between environment and development and the role of the various stakeholders in policy formulation, for instance, multilateral agencies, regional economic groupings, the state, NGOs, and the private sector. It explores the nature and use of environmental policy instruments. Policy examples are drawn from the international regional, and local contexts and case studies.
