Course Description
This course outlines China's relationship with other developing countries, with particular emphasis on mutually beneficial cooperation in emerging countries in social and economic development, including finance, trade, infrastructure, agriculture, industry and economic cooperation zones. Through the first-hand information and extensive literature readings from field studies around the world, the process of South-South cooperation in developing countries is fully displayed. At the same time, the history and theory of international development is used to analyze the opportunities and challenges of cooperation among emerging countries. Class discussion and practical research explore how development cooperation can achieve a win-win situation. In addition, the discussion puts the issue of international development in the context of capitalist modernization and globalization, and combines the analysis of the nature of capital with Marx, Adam Smith, Ricardo, Polanyi and other thinkers to explain the current political and economic phenomena. Classics are closely integrated with practical activities.
