Course Description

This course investigates the changing relationships between humans and their surrounding sonic environments. The course looks at the effects of the sonic environment on the human species, as individuals and as larger societies, and the ways in which humans are in turn responsible for drastic changes in the sonic environment, primarily since the advent of electronic and electroacoustic media technology. Another component is individual and group creative and research projects documenting the local sonic environment, accompanied by analytical essays. The semester culminates in public presentations of all projects.
