Course Description

Over the past centuries, economics has changed from a largely verbal discipline that studied human agency in commercial settings, to a mathematical discipline that incorporates scientific instruments such as statistics and laboratory practices. This course retraces this past and to see how modern economics emerged to its present form. Students assess the development of economic ideas, theories, and methods in their appropriate historical context with emphasize on incisive change of the economic discipline from the interwar to the post-war period. The primary objective is to enable students to historically assess the merits and limitations of contemporary economics in addressing major economic and social questions.
