Course Description

This course covers advanced topics in marketing research and consumer behavior. The course is divided into four modules. Module 1 first provides an overview of the important concepts such as marketing philosophies, marketing management process and marketing mix. It then examines the relationship between consumer markets and service marketing. Here, concepts such as service failure and recovery, customer satisfaction, and customer retention are examined. It consists of lectures, discussions of assigned materials, team presentation, and mini-exam. Module 2 focuses on the Japanese consumer and marketing strategies of Japanese companies. Japanese consumer is highly sophisticated consumer to compare with other advanced nations, so the Japanese companies have many unique strategies corresponding these consumers. Module 3 explores the academic literature of marketing strategy and distribution channels. Specific topics include market orientation, marketing capabilities, adaptive capabilities, channel integration, transaction costs, and asset specificity. Module 4 explores recent trends of marketing: "Word-of-Mouth on the information network" and "user/consumer innovation", then discusses new concepts of new marketing: "co-evolutionary marketing". For each week, reading list and questions for discussion are provided.
