Course Description

This course explores key topics in politics and gender. These include: theories of gender including discussions on sexuality and masculinity, the impact of gender on citizenship and voting behavior, whether it matters what the gender of political representatives is, how to ensure that political institutions are gender balanced, what the normative arguments are about the use of positive action measures, the concept of security through gendered lenses, the impact of gender in armed conflict, women's rights and human rights, and the importance of gender in international development. Throughout the course, students seek to focus on gender rather than on women and explore how various differences such as gender, class, ethnicity, nationality, and sexuality intersect to create inequalities.
