Course Description

In recent decades, examining borders has advanced to a central international topic. The great academic interest was fueled by processes of globalization that, while permitting some borders to become more permeable, also contributed to new hardening of borders, for example at the outer borders of Europe or between the USA and Mexico. While border studies initially focused on the exploration of interstate borders, symbolic boundaries have now come into focus. Borders are no longer understood merely as state borders, but also as forms of discursive practice and visual production of meaning, generating and forming experience. This lecture aims to explore the historical interaction between territorial and other symbolic boundary configurations, both gendered and racialized, in the history of Europe from antiquity to the present day.
