Course Description

This course discovers the richness and diversity of the disciplinary field of art history and aims to study how one examines and discusses works of art from both the past and present. This course has three components: sculpture, painting, and architecture. Faced with both famous and lesser known works, the course addresses the different aspects of sculpture—materials, techniques, vocabulary, functions, places of exhibition. In regards to painting, students study the function and location of the artwork, as well as learning how to critically examine these pieces. Lastly, the course explores the specificities of architecture and the way in which it is caught between the aspirations of artists and the constraints of technology or social issues.
