Course Description

The course examines the global history of migration and experiences of migration in the past. The first part of the course explores the reasons for individual and group migration, exploring the demographic context and impact of geographical mobility across different periods, and identifying different types of migration. Taking a long view of the history of migration, the course highlights the way shifting push and pull factors have shaped patterns of mobility in the past. With this demographic context in mind, the second part of the course examines migrant experiences since 1800 in more detail, considering how migration has been differentiated by class, race, gender, and age. By critically examining the sources, students recover migrant experience and consider both the subjective experience of migration and the ways in which migrant experiences have influenced national identities.
