Course Description

The course provides a framework for understanding key concepts and contemporary debates about food, as well as critically evaluating how past, current, and future food-related issues are framed and dealt with locally and globally. Students ask: What is food and where has it come from? Can we measure food? How does food act on us? Has food anything to do with government? Who can grow food and where? Whom do we eat with and who is not at the table? How could food be different? Can food be 'sustained' and is there a politics of food?
