Course Description

This course tackles questions of war, peace, and security from an analytical perspective, by highlighting changes and continuities in international security. The first half of the course reviews the major theoretical frameworks that have been used to explain the causes of war on the world stage, as well as its character and duration in the international and domestic arenas. Students use these theoretical frameworks as a lens through which to examine problems of war and peace, and threats to individual, national and international security in the contemporary era. The second half of the course turns to questions of security more generally. Students examine political violence, terrorism, insurgency, humanitarian emergencies, climate change, and other threats to individual and collective security.
