Course Description

This course provides an advanced introduction to current understandings of hunting and gathering societies, often seen as one of the most significant and long lived forms of human social organization. It explores the diversity of hunter-gatherers over time and space, and examines how and why such communities change, including as they develop or obtain domesticated plants and animals. The course takes a global perspective, and uses archaeological and anthropological approaches to explore the fascinating worlds of hunter-gatherers. The course uses seminars and class exercises to encourage students to take the lead in this process.
