Course Description

This course introduces students to the sociology of racism and ethnicity, using the UK experience as a case study. It explores the origins and development of racism within Britain, examining how it has shaped, and continues to shape the nature of British society. Students explore the role of “race thinking” in the production of inequalities and exclusions, as well as how it informs notions of national identity and citizenship. The course engages with contemporary debates and theoretical advances, particularly in relation to multiculturalism, critical whiteness studies, and “post-race” society.
