Course Description

The institutional law of international organizations comprises those rules of law that govern their legal status, structure, and functioning. This course explores core issues in this field, including international legal personality and the powers of international organizations, their decisions and decision making, and the control of and by international organizations, including dispute settlement. After a thorough study of the selected issues, those issues are analyzed more in-depth with regard to one or more international organizations, such as the UN and WTO. Whilst the first half of the course focuses on international organizations in general, the second half of the course focuses on the European Union. Both parts of the course address the same issues. In studying the selected topics, the courses explores the historical context and the societal forces that explain their existence. The tension between the intergovernmental and supranational method of cooperation serves as a leitmotiv throughout the entire course.
