Course Description

The course examines the economic development of different regions and countries based on an international perspective, international division of labor and regional development. Students master the basic analysis theories and tools of international economics, and cultivate the ability to independently study regional and national economic issues. The course comprehensively and systematically examines the economic status quo, development models and future trends of countries and regions that have a more prominent impact on the world economy and China's economy. The course is divided into three parts: world economy trends and developed economies; regional economy (Asian economies and the EU economy); and "along the way" and the emerging economies. The three modules respectively focus on the economic issues of the United States, Japan, Germany, Sweden, Russia and other countries, as well as the regional economies of the European Union and East Asia, and the economic issues along the "Belt and Road" of the "BRIC countries."
