Course Description

This course explores the social construction of race, ethnicity, and identity before investigating processes of racialization and othering. The course asks if we are now living in a post-racial age, or if this popular idea is better understood as a nonsense. Then, students examine sociological theories of the racial state, learn how to analyze media representations of race and ethnicity, and situate race and ethnicity within social, political, and economic processes. Students gain an overview of various approaches to "race" including exploring how differences "beyond race" such as hybridity and diaspora are negotiated. Finally, students explore if it is possible to move "beyond race" and considers the possibilities and pitfalls of anti-racism.
