Course Description

This course opens with an exploration of Irish culture and society in a new millennium. What is it about Ireland that is unique? And what is it, instead, that is part of a shared human experience that transcends borders, whether political or geographic? The course examines how millennia of history have shaped life on the island from the arrival of the first humans, through the Irish experience within the British Empire, and on to a partitioned island which is organized into two states: Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. The course also assesses how Ireland has been shaped by emigration, by Famine, and by media, among other forces. Woven through the course is an appraisal of continuity and change in political, social, economic, and cultural dimensions of Irish history.
