Course Description

This course analyzes the functions of European Union (EU) economic integration with a special focus on the Eurozone. It emphasizes the ways in which the European Single Market for goods, services, and capital impinges on the ability of national governments and European institutions to conduct economic policies. The implications of a monetary union for the functioning of member states' economies and domestic policies are analyzed with the help of macroeconomic tools. The various aspects of economic governance of the European monetary union are studied within the framework of a modern political economy. Structural aspects of the European integration (external economic relations and the role of the EU in globalization, banking and financial regulation, the economic implications of population aging, the transition to a low-carbon economic growth path, etc.) are also dealt with by mobilizing the most recent analyses. The course selects a number of issues that appear salient in current debates about the EU, its relationship with the rest of the world, and its future. It mobilizes the economist's analytical tool box to shed light on policy decision-making and pending issues.
