Course Description
This course surveys the foreign policies of the United States government from 1898 to the present, while emphasizing the deep and complex embeddedness of America with other regions of the world. The course highlights relations with East Asia and the Pacific, the Middle East, Latin America, and Europe. Students study the rise of nationalism around the world and the way that the United States has responded to this phenomenon. Students are equipped to analyze and evaluate historical claims about the precise nature and extent of America's role in the world from 1898 to now. The course outlines the continuing debate over the historic nature of American "empire."
