Course Description
This course develops a practice of engaged pedagogy that is holistic, experiential, relational and emancipatory. It explores a mode of learning that empowers people to take responsibility for their own education. Potential class topics might include, but are not limited to: protest, direct action, and new social movements organized around civil rights, feminism(s), LGBT(QIA) empowerment, sexual liberation, (grassroots) conservatism, animal rights, alterglobalization, ecology, or prison abolitionism, subculture, non-conformity, lifestyle as activism, punk, anarchism, consumer choice, techno, scholar activism, public history commodification, co-optation, and normalization of radical protest practices. Projects and coursework may be self-directed. There is room for students to incorporate archival research, ethnographic fieldwork, digital humanities, or other approaches to the study of history and culture.
