Course Description
This course explores the Tudor century in England, from 1485-1603, with a focus on England's place in European politics and movements, and in an increasingly global world. At the turn of the sixteenth century, England was a war-torn backwater. By the end, it had established a national identity and the foundations of a global empire. This course explores elements of cultural, political, religious, and social history in the Tudor century, utilizing case studies of individuals, families, communities, and artifacts in order to demonstrate the scale of the change that took place over the course of this century.
