Course Description

This course explores the long history of oratorical performance in the USA, from presidential speeches to University debates, from Native American orature to political activism. In so doing, students are introduced to the necessary tools to understand and critique the rhetorical choices of a range of speakers; to analyze the specific historical and cultural factors that give rise both to the speeches they encounter and the rhetorical choices of their delivery; and to a range of key historical and political events in the life of the USA as well as the range of activists and advocates that give voice to them.
