Course Description

Through four decades of consistent economic, diplomatic, and military growth, China has been upgraded its global status to a level of the great power. Its power and influence has been so imposing that it has served as a principal cause of profound changes in East Asia and the world. China's growing economic and military power, expanding political influence, distinctive diplomatic voice, and increasing involvement in regional multilateral institutions have been key developments in East Asian affairs. Given the rise of China and subsequent global and regional changes, this course explores the international behaviors of China. In particular, it reviews China's contemporary diplomacy from two different angles: historical perspectives (before mid-term) and issue-analytical perspectives (after mid-term).
