Course Description

In this course, undergraduate students develop an understanding of social science engagements with international development, aid, and humanitarianism whilst focusing their attention on the global challenges of poverty, inequality, human rights, the environment, gender, urbanization, public health, and migration. The course explores the histories, impacts, and legacies of international development planning and policy, introducing students to foundational issues in development studies and offering them the opportunity to conduct a modest research project on a specific theme. The course explores the relationships between economic growth and inequality, structures of aid and trade, relationships of power and dependency, conflict, urbanization, and migration as well as approaches to sustainable development.
