Course Description

This course is designed to provide an overview of the sociology of gender at the graduate level. Particularly it purports to deliver two goals: one is to understand facts and mechanisms of gender inequality in the labor market and at home and the other is to explore the intersection between gender and class while doing so. Topical areas include: gender theories, gender and organization, gender inequality in the labor market, families, care work, and household division of labor, and gender, state and debates on egalitarian strategies. Students should work on a paper or proposal relevant to gender and employment during the semester. On the last day of class, we have a round-table in which students present their drafts of final papers.
