Course Description

This course examines the politics, society, and economy of the Greek world and its relations with neighboring peoples in the Archaic Period (800-478 BC). The course explores the emergence and character of the leading Greek city-states and their geographical spread throughout the Mediterranean world; the rise of powerful non-Greek neighbors, especially Persia, during the 6th century; and, the interaction between them, culminating in the Persian Wars. Students investigate the first work of western historiography, THE HISTORIES OF HERODOTUS, and the potential problems of using other sorts of archaeological, documentary, and literary evidence to write the history of this period.
