Course Description

This is an exploratory course that studies multiple narrative possibilities through a practical exploration of story-telling. In the first half of the course, students look at narrative and its forms. Students explore books, photographs, film, and performance as examples of possible ways of telling stories. At the same time, students explore what each student's story might be in terms of finding a form that fits. The design of the course works to open up possibilities, and not tie students down with commitments to particular strategies.
