Course Description

This course introduces the background of China's political institution and culture and provides overview of the relationship between China's media and politics in a global context. The course provides a broad perspective of China's political communication and a familiarity with China's media system and its political consequences. Four general topics are explored: China's media system; China's international communication system; Chinese nationalism in international conflicts; China's public diplomacy and international relations. For each topic, the course is conducted with two lectures and one seminar. The students are divided into several groups, each of which will give a presentation on each topic.
