Course Description

This course enables students to understand and analyze the impact of development practices, particularly as they have affected women and men in different contexts. The course offers an introduction to debates around the gendered impact of different economic and political development trajectories and policies such as industrialization, agricultural transformations, democratization, and contemporary structural adjustment programs. Case studies drawn from different regions and contexts are used to illustrate the theoretical debates, including those distinguishing 'women in development' approaches from 'gender and development' approaches. Assessment: coursework (50%), and final exam (50%).
