Course Description

This course compares core themes in the ethnography of forest peoples. With a focus on forest-dwelling people in regions including Amazonia, Melanesia, and the Congo Basin, the course assesses a number of anthropological approaches to understanding human-environmental interactions. It evaluates some of the diverse ways that societies in forested regions construct and understand the relations between nature and society, myth and history, cosmology and ritual, person-hood and the body, and cultural tradition and transformation..
