Course Description

Can politics be a "science"? This course encourages one to think like a political scientist and become a more discerning consumer of political information -- to "think big, but systematically" about the problems and puzzles facing Japan and international polities. As one studies the research process, from concept to design, they apply skills to tackle problems central to political systems like trust, corruption and gender inequality -- and think further about what democracy is, how it can be measured, and how it can be improved.
