Course Description

This course examines globalization, internationalism and transnationalism, with a particular focus on anthropological approaches. It covers whether people have always been on the move crossing borders and how this might be different in our age of globalization; the impact of globalization on local cultures; humans moving towards a global culture; globalizing consumerism; globality in relationship to inequalities such as those involving gender, class, race, wealth; and globalization in relationship to Aboriginal concerns and International Human Rights, peace and war issues, and law and international law.
