Course Description

This class aims to provide a pan-European examination of the analysis of democratic performance on major issues affecting contemporary European democracies. continent's politics - one rooted in a comparative rather than a country-by-country approach. After reviewing ontological and epistemological foundations in comparative political science and setting the historical and socio-economic context, the module focuses on comparative analysis of prominent political issues facing European states (including mediatisation of politics, interest groups, social movements, immigration and multi-culturalism, gender and politics, new radical right challenges to established party systems) before concluding with a comparative analysis of democratic performance as measured by objective and subjective indicators of government outputs.
