Course Description

This course offers an individual and collective occasion to master research, planning, and writing abilities to make sense of recent developments in connection and comparison with each other by using several political-historical methods. It trains students to interpret and deconstruct contemporary and past events with an original gaze by asking well-defined research questions; conducting research using traditional sources such as archives, as well as digital techniques; collecting, citing, and quoting sources; and bringing their findings together using analytical, historiographical, and conceptual tools. Connections are made between cases in international and global arena, supported by the findings through archival research, interviews, interdisciplinary approach, and the review of press and secondary literature. By adopting a critical review of their findings, students follow and comprehend sophisticated academic debates; take cultural, contextual, and ideological differences into consideration; work with techniques offered by multiple disciplines; report on their studies and research; and learn time management.
