Course Description

This course provides an overview of digital journalism, including the current state of this field as well as different ways of studying it. It examines different responses to the emergence of digital journalism, including how digital technologies are said to change who makes the news, who is able to access it, who is given voice, who participates, how news content is produced, how news audiences are measured and quantified, how content is paid for, and who makes money from the news. These issues are explored through a combination of key readings and "empirical experiments" with digital methods for studying web trackers, hyperlinks, online platforms, data, algorithms, bots, "fake news" and other digital objects, devices, and infrastructures. While students gain digital skills and an understanding of digital journalistic practices from this module, its focus is academic rather than vocational.
