Course Description
This course is an introduction to a series of theories and debates within the interdisciplinary study of religion and politics. It introduces students to the use of political techniques to question how authority is constructed in the secular and religious spheres and presented through institutions such as government, church, civil society, and international forums. The course develops students' understanding of how power, authority, competition, and identities are conceived in the modern world. Topics include secular and religious politics, Church and State, local and global religious civil society, and godly kingdoms and nation-states.
