Course Description

This course focuses on Irish fiction from the 21st century, examining the ways in which Irish literature has responded to the changing state of Ireland, from the onset of the Celtic Tiger to the financial crisis and beyond. This course demonstrates the relevance of new works to broader social and political issues including but not limited to, affluence and class divisions, the body and gender politics, the financial crisis, abuse and trauma, silence, immigration, and emigration. This course examines emerging trends in Irish literature, and with its selection of writers who have published work after the turn of the century, looks to a bright future of engaged and critical Irish writing.
