Course Description

This course introduces the concept of communication power and its social, economic, and political impacts in today's network society with an interdisciplinary approach. It critically examines the changes in social, economic, and political power relations in the network society. The course is divided into three parts. The first part introduces fundamental concepts and theories of communication power and the network society. The second part explores their social, economic, political impacts. The third part is case studies, in which students research, analyze, and present on social, economic, and political issues to reflect on the theories and concepts.
