Course Description

This course introduces the field of business anthropology as an applied social science aimed at understanding organizational and consumer cultures, exploring how businesses use anthropology, how culture shapes consumption choices, and how culture affects businesses as organizations in various parts of the world. Topics include the importance of branding, homemaking, and identity; how cultural insights shape product design; cultural difference at work; and the business implications of organizational cultures. The course explores these issues using a mix of research articles, websites, and case studies of companies like Intel, Mujirushi Ryohin, Ford, and the New York Stock Exchange to provide examples of the ways culture shapes business practices globally.
